“ Mary was my secretary and office manager when I was with the Upjohn company. She was very dependable and trustworthy to the degree that I would leave her with signed blank checks, both personal and company when I was on the road , which was almost fifty percent of the time, she ran the office in an efficient and professional manner that all other offices at the Houston Upjohn facility, her loss is irreplaceable to all that knew her.

“ Hey Aunt Mary,
I love you so much! When I was "found" you, Dee, Jasmyne, Joe and Tacho, did not treat me like I was a stranger; I was treated like I was in this family all along. You always spoke your mind and told me the truth. You gave me hope and encouraged me to go on even after I lost hope in "finding" my father(Leo). I hate myself because I took life for granted. I did not call you like I should have or spent time with you, but yet and still you kept loving me. I am in college because of you. You all came at a pivotal moment in my life. Thank you for being reassuring me that quitting should always be far from my thoughts. I love you always aunt Mary, and somehow I am going to get that recipe for making apple pie!!!

“ Your loved one is gone. If you no longer have an ingredient to make cookies, it's easy to realize that replacing it with a different ingredient would not make the cookies start tasting like they used to. To expect that you will be able to replace your loved one is also unrealistic. This reality may sound even more depressing. Frankly, I love chocolate chip cookies, and the idea of not ever having one again is quite upsetting! But in time, if I had to, I could grow to love other sweets, like banana bread, sweet potato pie, or brownies. So, even if you aren't going to get over it, in time, you will adapt to the loss and find fulfillment through other experiences and relationships.

So, be patient with yourself. Losing someone isn't easy. It turns your life upside down. Naturally, it's going to take a while to pick up the pieces and transition to life without your loved one. Remember, Beethoven composed some beautiful music after losing his hearing, and you will find happiness and fulfillment again in your life after losing your loved one.###imported-begin###WILLIE C WILLIAMS###imported-end###
